

The Faculty Senate has set guidelines pertaining to the observation of religious holidays. These have become university policy and are as follows:

1. that students notify faculty during the first week of the semester of their intention to be absent from class on their day(s) of religious observance.
2. that faculty continue to extend to these students the courtesy of absence without penalty on such occasions, including permission to make up examinations.
3. that faculty who intend to observe a religious holiday arrange at the beginning of the semester to re-schedule missed classes or to make other provisions for their course-related activities.
4. that, prior to each semester, the administration circulate to faculty a schedule of religious holidays most frequently observed by GW students.
5. that student members of other religious groups are also entitled to the same courtesies and accommodations.
6. that the administration conveys this policy to students by including it in the Schedule of Classes and other places deemed appropriate.

Birth of Buddha (Wesak)	PLEASE SEE NOTE BELOW		Buddhist

*PLEASE NOTE: Although these dates were taken from sources that we feel are reliable, dates often vary by source.

** The Birth of Buddha is observed on different days in different countries. The various dates are due to the numerous calendars used throughout the world. Some dates confirmed by religious leaders are April 8, May 25, June 1.

According to several schools of Islamic law, which are followed by many of our Muslim students, attendance at the Friday congregational prayers is a required religious duty. Although the precise time of observance varies from year-to-year, it always remains within the time period of 12:00 noon to 2:00 p.m.

Jewish holidays begin at sunset of the previous evening.
